Refund offset: Any refund youâ€™re due may be applied against the penalty and interest balance. The calculation begins with the amount you should have paid for the specific quarter, determined by dividing your expected annual tax liability by four. If you paid less, the shortfall multiplies by the 5% penalty rate. Interest is then added on the combined principal and penalty, using the rate announced by the state for that fiscal year. Because interest compounds, the longer the balance sits unpaid, the larger the total cost. the mechanics—how the state computes charges, what enforcement tools it can use, and how you can fix the error—helps you avoid a costly surprise at tax time. New York requires individuals and businesses who earn income that isn't subject to withholding—such as self-employment earnings, rental income, or capital gains—to make periodic estimated payments. The goal is to spread tax liability across the year, mirroring the payroll withholding most employees experience. If you fall behind, the state treats the shortfall as underpayment, triggering statutory penalties. A missed or late payment doesn't instantly freeze your accounts, but the Department will automatically apply a penalty of 5% of the underpaid amount for each quarter that is late. In addition, interest accrues daily at the current rates published by the state, which can turn a modest oversight into a significant bill. Interest: Compounded daily based on the prevailing rate for New York State tax arrears.
