A third issue is not taking the time to review and analyze the data. Score sheets are only as good as the action taken on the data. Coaches and players must carve out time to review the data, identify trends, and make adjustments accordingly. Different teams have unique needs, and your score sheets should reflect that. For example, if you have a young, inexperienced team, you may want to focus on tracking basic stats, such as scoring, rebounding, and assists. However, if you have a seasoned team with a strong shooting threat, you may want to track more advanced metrics, such as true shooting percentage and defensive rating. The type of competition also plays a significant role in what to track. During the regular season, you may focus on improving team chemistry and developing young players. In the playoffs, you may shift your focus to more tactical aspects, such as
