to Colorado's local governments routinely lose millions in potential revenue, not because of market forces but due to avoidable administrative slip-ups. Recent audits show that delayed tax filings, missed state incentives, and bottlenecked permit processes each cost municipalities between 3 % and 9 % of their annual budgets. By pinpointing where the waste occurs, officials can plug the leaks before the next fiscal year ends. When a city submits its sales tax remittance a week late, the state imposes a 0.5 % penalty on the outstanding amount. For a mid-size municipality collecting roughly $12 million annually, that penalty translates to $60,000 in lost revenue—money that could fund road resurfacing or fire department upgrades.
