Parents who know the struggle of feeding a toddler or a pre-teen can attest that the phrase "picky eater" is more than a label—it's a daily challenge. In Chicago, the Chicago Public Schools (CPS) have responded by revamping their campus menus to accommodate children with selective tastes, aiming to deliver balanced meals that still feel approachable for the youngest diners. Nationwide studies show that children who reject a wide range of foods are more likely to miss essential nutrients, especially protein, iron, and calcium. For schools that serve nearly 300,000 students, providing a menu that balances nutritional mandates with appealing options is a logistical puzzle. CPS's new "Kid-Friendly Menu" framework acknowledges that a one-size-fits-all approach fails when the target audience is a mix of 4-year-olds and 14-year-olds. Protein — Often limited to meat-based dishes, but kids may avoid poultry or fish. Vitamins A and C — Frequently sourced from colorful vegetables that are rarely on a picky eater's plate. By aligning menu design with the American Academy of Pediatrics' "Five Food Group" guidelines, CPS seeks to ensure each child receives at least one serving from each category without forcing the experience. CPS's new menus feature "Build Your Own" stations where students can assemble a sandwich or a bowl, selecting from a range of proteins, grains, and vegetables. One elementary school reported that after introducing a "Taco Tray" where children choose their toppings, participation in the lunch program rose by 12% over a single semester.
