Emory undergraduates and graduates alike often stumble over a handful of predictable calendar slip-upsâ€”missing registration deadlines, overlooking spring break dates, and confusing semester start times. These errors can cost grades, delay graduation, or force a costly lateâ€”add fee. Understanding where the calendar trips most students up is the first step to staying on track. Emoryâ€™s academic year runs on a semester system, but the official dates are tucked away in a PDF that many students never open. The semester start and end dates, the addâ€”drop window, and the last day to withdraw with a â€œWâ€”each have their own deadlines. For example, the addâ€”drop period typically closes two weeks after classes begin; failing to enroll in a required course before then can leave a student with an incomplete schedule and no easy way to substitute a needed class. Another common source of confusion is the universityâ€™wide â€œClass Cancelledâ€” policy that kicks in after a certain number of holidays. Spring break, Thanksgiving, and the winter intersession are all listed, but the dates shift slightly each year. Overlooking these shifts can lead to missed assignments or exams scheduled on a holiday. Jordan, a sophomore in the College of Arts & Sciences, tried to add a required statistics class after the first week of classes. Because the add/drop window had already closed, the department required a petition, and the process delayed his enrollment by two weeks. He ended up missing the first three lectures and had to catch up on a fast-paced syllabus. Graduate students sometimes reference the quarter calendar used by a partner institution and mistakenly assume Emory's summer term ends in early August. In reality, Emory's summer semester wraps up at the end of July, meaning any final project due after July 31 will be considered late. A senior in the School of Nursing scheduled a clinical rotation on a day that fell within the university's scheduled Spring Break. The hospital confirmed the date, but Emory's official calendar listed the entire week as a break, leading to a clash with mandatory coursework and an unavoidable "W" on the grade report.
