Recent adjustments to withholding tables, electronic filing requirements, and unemployment insurance (UI) contribution calculations are already affecting payroll cycles. This guide pinpoints the most common oversights and offers practical workarounds so you can keep your payroll compliant without losing precious time. The North Carolina Department of Revenue (NCDOR) released updated withholding brackets that tighten the alignment between employee wages and state tax deductions. Simultaneously, the Department of Commerce refined UI wage bases, meaning the portion of each paycheck subject to unemployment tax may be higher for some roles. Finally, electronic filing mandates now apply to all employers with more than five active employees, eliminating the paper-based option for most businesses. Many payroll software packages still reference the 2022 tables. A single outdated bracket can cascade into under-withheld taxes, triggering interest charges and audit red flags. Cross-checking the NCDOR's current charts before each payroll run eliminates this risk. Employers often apply a uniform UI rate across all staff, ignoring the new wage-base limits that differ by industry. The result is an overpayment for lower-paid workers and an underpayment for higher earners—both of which erode cash flow and raise compliance questions. Paper submissions are now limited to a handful of exempt entities. Companies that continue to mail Form NC-5 quarterly risk late-filing penalties. Switching to the NCDOR's e-file portal is not just a convenience; it's a compliance imperative. Automate Table Updates. Choose a payroll vendor that syncs its withholding tables with NCDOR releases in real time. If you maintain a manual system, set a calendar reminder for the first of each quarter to download the latest PDFs.
