Inside this guide: “Where to You've decided to look up a case in Philadelphia. Perhaps it's for a landlord-tenant dispute, to check the status of a family court matter, or just out of civic curiosity. In the past, this meant a trip to a courthouse basement, squinting at microfiche, or waiting in line for a clerk. Today, the process starts with a search bar. But what can you actually expect when you go searching Philadelphia dockets online? The journey from query to case file is more accessible than ever, yet it comes with a specific learning. A "docket" is simply the official log of all filings, motions, and events in a court case. Philadelphia's court system, like many large municipal courts, has moved significant portions of these records online. Your primary tool will be the Philadelphia Court of Common Pleas or Municipal Court's web portal. Expect to navigate a public-facing interface that requires you to search by case number, party name, or sometimes attorney information. This digital gateway is the first major benefit: the ability to start your. The most significant advantage is transparency and time. For a curious beginner, this means you can often see if a case has been filed, its general category (civil, criminal, traffic), and sometimes a list of major events without leaving your chair. It helps you form a baseline understanding before you ever contact a lawyer or visit the courthouse. For a more targeted search, like a small claims suit against a business, knowing the docket exists lets you prepare the right questions and gather necessary documents. Here's where managing expectations is key. Online docket portals are powerful indexes, but they are not complete case repositories. You will likely see the names of filed documents (e.g., "Complaint," "Motion for Summary Judgment"), but you will not see the actual PDF files of those documents through the public search. That detailed content typically requires a paid request or an in-person visit. Furthermore, not all cases appear online immediately; there can be a lag, and very old or sealed records may be entirely. Assuming your initial online search yields a case number, your next steps require clarity. First, determine what you truly need. If you only need a summary of events, the online docket may suffice. If you need to read a specific motion or court order, you must prepare to either pay the court's fee for electronic document retrieval or visit the appropriate division of the Philadelphia Courts to view and print the documents yourself.
