The suit, filed in federal court, alleges that certain Apple products failed to meet advertised performance standards, and thousands of potential claimants must submit documentation before the cutâ€‘off date to preserve any right to compensation. The deadline is not merely procedural; it determines who can participate in any eventual settlement or judgment. Once the filing period ends, individuals who missed the window are barred from collective relief and must pursue separate legal avenues, which are often more costly and less certain. The urgency reflects the courtâ€™s effort to finalize the class definition and move the case toward resolution.
